One of the more impressive debutants introduced at this past Fort Lauderdale Boat Show was Grady's new Canyon 386 bluewater sportfisher. To call it just a center console would be an injustice to this newbie's true multi-mission capabilities as equal parts canyon sportfisher, weekend getaway SUV, family beach buggy and dockside entertainment platform. The Grady-White design team took the best of the former Canyon 376 and made it even better for this year's Canyon 386, also borrowing technology from Grady's flagship 456.

The new Canyon 386 features a 36-foot, 6-inch length supported by an extra wide 13-foot, 2-inch beam, making it the largest of any center console in its size class. That added square footage equates to a roomier cockpit and console interior, as well as an expansive helm and a lean bar full of conveniences. This extra acreage is immediately evident at the helm, where four luxurious adjustable deluxe contoured helm chairs with flip-up bolsters and fold-down arm and footrests are strategically positioned behind the wraparound windshield, providing all day comfort and protection from the elements. The captain sits centered on the sleek black helm with a full view of the large flush mount electronics area and easy access to push button controls. An integrated T-top encompasses the roomy helm area and all four seats and comes complete with standard SureShade, see-through hatch, storage net, radio box, six rod holders, LED spreader and recessed lights. Down below, a large, enclosed head area with sink, china head and stand-up shower provides privacy for weekend getaways.
